Throughout her apprenticeship, Frieren was trained to forever conceal her mana like her master as a deception strategy against demons.^[3] As her mentor, Flamme was able to predict Frieren's future predicaments—such as her desire to understand humans on a deeper level—and made preparations to guide her a thousand years in advance.^[4]

At some point, Flamme brought Frieren to meet Serie, another elf and Flamme's former master. Although Serie voiced her approval with her strength, she was disappointed by Frieren's devotion towards the pursuit of magic when given the opportunity to receive any grimoire she desired. However, Flamme assured Frieren would become capable of defeating the Demon King and bringing about a peaceful era, even when Serie couldn't.^[5]

Frieren remained Flamme's apprentice until she passed away from old age ^{W.} nearly half a century later. Prior to this

after, Himmel passed away and she attended his funeral. During the procession, Frieren broke into tears and voiced her regret over not getting to know him more given the length of a human's lifespan. Influenced by this event, she continued on her journey to pursue magic with the intention of also learning and understanding humans more.^[9]

Twenty years after Himmel's passing, Frieren sought out Heiter in the outskirts of the Holy City Strahl and stumbled across a young girl named Fern, whom Heiter had saved. When Heiter requested that Frieren make Fern—a mage-in-training—her apprentice, she refused, citing the high death rate of mage apprentices on the battlefield. However, Heiter then requested that she decipher a grimoire on resurrection and immortality while training Fern in her free time, to which she agreed. After five to six years, she had inadvertently ended up training Fern to a point where she was no less capable than an adult, and acknowledging Heiter's scheme, she finally agreed to take on Fern as her apprentice. After Heiter passed, she and Fern visited his grave.
